The decision comes after the Office of Government Ethics (OGE) determined that a potential conflict of interest would arise if Rep. Neal Dunn (R-NC) and a trade association he represents hold seats on the board of NRDC, a nonpartisan environmental advocacy organization. OGE notes that OGE has not defined what it means by "direct, personal, financial and/or political relationship," and for that reason, the decision of Dunn to withdraw from the board of NRDC was premature. Rep. Neal Dunn (R-NC) has decided not to sit on the board of the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC) after ethics officials determined that he would potentially have a conflict of interest. Dunn said that he was "disappointed" by the OGE decision. He noted that the decision came after a "thorough review process," but that he thought that his reasons for withdrawing had been "unclear." "I have no wish to do anything to embarrass NRDC or its mission," Dunn said. "But I do not want to be part of an organization that does not focus on the most important issues in our time – our environment and our economy." Dunn noted that the NRDC board "is made up of strong environmental advocates who have the best interests of the public in mind." "It is my hope that the next steps with the board and the organization will be to ensure that the organization can continue to support the most important issues that will strengthen the economy and protect the environment," Dunn added. Dunn said he would like to return to the NRDC board once he has moved beyond his current role as "a legislator who wants to advance the interests of his constituents." "If I can do 82157476af
